CULTURE OF CAMELLIAS

Camellias seem to thrive and grow in various soils and locations. However, they prefer a light, rich, slightly acid soil, well drained location, partial shade and protected from heavy winter winds. Do not plant too deeply. Upon receiving a balled and burlapped camellia, do not remove burlap or cut cord; plant as is about 1 inch below ground level, fertilize with well rotted dairy compost, cotton seed meal, or Vigoro. Give a thin mulch with pine straw or small oak leaves. Use sparingly so water can get through to the roots of the plants.

We find that a camellia well pruned of its small, stringy, weak growth, and good fertilizing at least twice a year will keep the plant in a healthy, vigorous condition; therefore, it should be better able to resist various diseases and fungi.

INSECTS

Scale—May be controlled by using Garden Volch. 1 part of Volch to 50 parts of water. Do not use in winter months if there is danger of freezes. We usually spray from May 10-20 when the scale is at its most vulnerable stage.

Phomopsis—Can be controlled by spraying with Bordeaux mixture. 16 lbs. to 100 gallons of water. Before spraying, prune out all dead growth one to two inches below dying point.

OUR GRAFTED CAMELLIAS

Many of our finest new varieties come from a small stock plant from which only a very few cuttings can be taken. We then take the root system of a camellia worth at least $15.00 as an evergreen and graft the rare scion to it. Thus in two years we have a plant the size of a six year one propagated by ordinary methods. The fact we ruin a good plant to obtain its root system is the reason they are relatively expensive. However, their rapid growth strongly offsets their high price.

Most of our grafts are on 8-10 year stock. For some reason, grafts will vary widely in size and shape despite the fact the understock is similar. We are very fortunate in the fact our understock has been rootpruned several times and their vigorous roots make our grafts thick and bushy, instead of the single long spindly stem one usually sees. If one of ours should happen to be a slender one, naturally it would not be priced according to its height. Thus each graft is priced according to its own merits.

OUR ORIGINAL VARIETIES

Magnolia Gardens were made world-famous by its azaleas being seen by the thousands of people who visited every spring—few ever realizing the magnificent camellias they walked by were even growing there—their glory had passed with the coming of the azaleas. Those who really know the Gardens feel that the place should be famous for its camellias collection which so few people see in the winter and early spring.

These camellias were imported by the Reverend John G. Drayton, creator of Magnolia Gardens, during the 1840's from France and Belgium. We have a letter of his written to a fellow minister dated 1858 in which he states "I was afraid the other day that I had been exaggerating when in answer to his inquiries, I told a friend that I supposed there might be some 120 varieties of camellias at Magnolia. So I sat down and summed up the count afterwards and found that number of fine double varieties and how many more, I do not pretend to know—their name seems to be something like 'Legion'. Many of the plants are near 10 feet high and as thick as a holly bush—with almost as many flowers as leaves—". Some of these have reached colossal proportions, one double variety now measuring 28 feet in height, 23 feet through, and 16 inches in trunk diameter.

A few of our varieties have been on the market for years, and you will be surprised to find you probably already have some of them in your collection.

MAGNOLIA HYBRIDS

When camellias have reached such an age as ours, they seed very freely. In past years, these seed have sprung up all over the Garden and many have turned into magnificent new varieties. We have, at Magnolia, such a great concentration of fine varieties—old plants which produce seed—that the seed of these old plants more often than not is from the pollenization of one or two very fine varieties. Thus, we have every year a great number of new and beautiful camellia varieties. Since we started this Camellia Nursery in 1941, we have been carefully gathering up and planting all seed. Also, we take up all seedlings which spring up in the Garden and grow them on. At the present time, we have over 30,000 little seedlings, so we hope to always offer new outstanding varieties every year to camellia lovers.
